

KUT-EL-AMARA TAKES POSITION ON WAR MAP

Town on the Tigris, Formerly Insignificant, Has Attained Importance.

"The remarkable achievement of the English Gen. Townshend in withstanding the siege of the Turkish army at Kut-el-Amara since early in December will insure this insignificant town, which is situated on the east bank of the Tigris river, a conspicuous place in the geography of the world when the history of the great struggle is written," says a bulletin of the National Geographic Society of Washington.

"Before the English army was hemmed in at this unhealthy coaling station, steamers plying between the great date port of Basra and the important city of Bagdad, Kut-el-Amara, 100 miles south-east of the latter city, was nothing more or less than one of the myriad out-of-the-way places to fortune and to fame unknown."

Floods Not at Height.
"The town, which at the beginning of the war was a Turkish post controlling the lower reaches of the Tigris, is situated at the junction of the old river channel and the new, the former forming the still navigable Shatt-el-Hal canal, flowing into the Euphrates. The Tigris and the Euphrates, which approach within thirty-five miles of each other at Bagdad, are nearly 100 miles apart at this point. At Basra they converge and form the Shatt-el-Arab, sixty miles from the Persian Gulf."

"All of the meager accounts which have come from this zone of the war in recent months have emphasized the suffering which the high waters have caused by the European troops. Unhappily, these sufferings have not yet reached their limit, for the Tigris, which begins to rise in November, is not at the maximum stage until the latter part of May. Then the plains become vast marshlands and the inland sea is dotted with islands of date palm groves."

"When the Tigris is in flood in the vicinity of Kut-el-Amara it flows at the rate of four miles an hour, and brings down from the headwaters quantities of mud, which is deposited in banks and shoals in the river, resulting in frequent changes in the channel."

"Numerous abandoned canals weave their way through this section of Mesopotamia, and through a country lying to the northwest of the Tigris, between the river and the foothills of Persia."

Garden Spot of Ancients.
"In a former age an extensive irrigation system made this land a wonderful garden of fruits and flowers. Centuries of disease have caused the canals to become choked with silt and refuse, converting much of the once productive district into miasmatic marshes, which are a menace to health and an offense to sight and smell."

"Wherever there is an effort at cultivation, the husbandman is rewarded like the farmer of the Nile delta. The finest dates in the world are raised a short distance to the southeast of Kut-el-Amara, rice, wheat, barley, roses and horehound are grown. Herds of horses, sheep and camels constitute the chief wealth of the nomadic tribes."

"When the veterans of the Kut-el-Amara campaign return to England a large percentage will bear scars of the siege of the deep, disfiguring 'Bagdad date mark' or 'Aleppo button,' a painful but not dangerous disease prevalent in Mesopotamia. The 'mark' is a boil which attacks the face, neck, hands and soles of the feet. Nails are said to escape with one sore, as a rule, but often afflicts the other hand or foot. If the survivors should be called upon to make a second campaign through Asia Minor, the 'mark' will be immune, as the 'button' appears a second time on the same person."

Glasgow.
Rome was built on seven hills, but Glasgow stretches here and there about seventeen. This is only one of the many features in which Glasgow excels Rome. About the giant of the north there is a combination of the great modern city and the picturesque old town, of the captain of industry and the patron of the arts, of coldness and austerity with sympathy and grace that is hard to match anywhere.

Glasgow has much of the picturesque about her, but she never gets credit for it because Edinburgh is in the neighborhood. Edinburgh is picturesque in such a spectacular fashion that no other Scotch city has much of a chance. So it is taken for granted that Edinburgh represents the Scotland that is put on canvas and Glasgow the Scotland that goes into bank books. Under more favorable circumstances, Glasgow might have won a name in both lines, but as it is she has to be content with her modern buildings and her vulgar predominance in trade.

The list of the things that Glasgow does and makes would sound like the report of the secretary of a number of commerce with town lots for sale. It would include apparently everything that the human race has any use for or finds any profit or pleasure in producing. But above all things, Glasgow is the hub of the world for the shipping business. She is a sort of Pittsburgh-by-the-sea, with her iron ore and her steel mills, and with her many any place to go, she probably make steel rails in immense quantities. The geographical limitations of Great Britain make it certain check on the length of railroads, so Glasgow builds ships instead. "Clyde-hull" bottoms are the aristocrats of the sea.

It is hard to carry away any definite impression from Glasgow. The picture that sticks in your memory is of a city of broad solidity, of stately buildings, gray and cool, of long and low medieval architecture broken here and there by some old-time shop or church, of busy streets shuttled through with double-decked trolley cars, of a pleasant Scotch burr in the king's English, of a life serious and strenuous, like the city, and like the city varied now and again by some decorous interval sacred to dignified amusements.

Texas Onion Crop Estimate.
The Department of Agriculture has estimated the Texas-Bermuda onion crop of Texas at 2,041,571 bushels, basing its calculation on the general condition of the crop April 15, which it placed at 58 per cent, forecasting a production of 208 bushels an acre.
